Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: . . . representatives who gave informal accounts of their observations for the benefit of the rest at the last class of the Session. These accounts occupied about fifteen minutes each, and were supplemented by observations of others who had worked in the same set. The show of seedlings in boxes was really exciting. Many kinds were tried and the following were found very useful: --beans, peas, lupins, vegetable marrows, tropieolums, mustard, cres: , , buckwheat and maize. One bean-seedling grew to twenty-seven inches above the sawdust, and showed flowers afterabout seven weeks growth. Great interest was aroused by the varying length of shoot from a single bud, the connections between branching and veining, and the position and movements of flowers as protection against rain. The greatest value of this method seems to me to lie in the actual experience of practical difficulties (even of growing seedlings, or measuring tree-shoots) which the students gain, and which I am sure cannot fail to be useful to them in their own teaching. It also arouses keen interest iti plants as living things, and gives greater power of solving the many smaller problems of plant-life which are continually cropping up in any Botany class. It also provides training in close observation, and clear expression. A similar method (as indicated in a paper in your June number) would be very valuable in a School. Indeed, in so far as my students were beginners, the work given them approximated to School work in character,...
